Profile Farmers of the Year 2010

Ms. Maritza Lazo is a junior farmer from the village of Bomba in the Belize District. She cultivates onions, tomatoes, sweet pepper, plantains, and fruit trees among other crops. Her semi-mechanized farm is equipped with a drip irrigation system for vegetable production and has an assortment of tools and machinery to facilitate field operations. This farmer also rears cattle, pigs and local chickens. Ten acres of the thirty acre farm are under improved pastures. Over the past years, Ms. Lazo has participated in trainings for vegetable production and soil management. This has prompted her to adopt good agriculture practices such as composting to improve soil fertility. She believes that the soil is a living thing; so it has to be nourished properly to obtain the best returns. In addition to field cultivation, this young farmer manually does milking of cows and makes cheese that is sold in the local community. Ms. Lazo maintains proper records and is fully cognizant and appreciates the importance of agricultural entrepreneurship.

has introduced a drip irrigation system with an industrial well, recently acquired a tropical greenhouse and has an assortment of field agricultural tools and equipment. A portion of the produce is usually used for home consumption and the surplus is sold at the local market. She has developed a label for her produce to identify and distinguish her products. Mrs. Gonzalez keeps good records of her operations because she firmly believes in taking a business approach to agriculture.

Senior Farmer of the Year is Mr. Manases Canto from San Antonio Village, Cayo District. Mr. Canto farm comprises of plantains, fruit trees, cattle, pigs and local chicken. He also cultivates sweet peppers, carrots, peanuts, potatoes and other vegetables. Traditionally Mr. Canto has used the Milpa system, but over the years he has evolved into a semi-mechanized operation. To improve his vegetable production, this farmer has established a drip irrigation system at his farm and acquired a protective covered structure to grow better quality vegetables. His produce is mainly sold at the San Ignacio market. Over the years Mr. Canto has received and participated in numerous trainings that have assisted him with his farm operations. He has a good technical background in animal husbandry and vegetable production including the proper management and control of pest and disease. His twenty acres farm is, no doubt, diversified, but his aim is to eventually convert it into a fully integrated farming system. For Mr. Manases Canto, agriculture is not only a good business, but also a way of life that he will continue to pursue.

Female Farmer of the Year is Mrs. Julia Isabel Gonzalez from the village of Rockstone Pond in the Belize District. Mr. Gonzalez has been working on her seventeen acre farm for the past twenty years. Today, this farmer has established a mixed farm that includes crops as well as livestock. It includes onions, potatoes, Red Kidney beans, corn, fruit trees and a variety of vegetables including lettuce, Pac Choi, sweet pepper, watermelons among others. The livestock component of the farm consists of five beef cattle with eight acres of improved pastures and 500 Tilapia fingerlings. To improve her production capacity and field operations, she
